Pediatric Limb Ischemia: Our Experience from a Tertiary Hospital in Oman

²Vascular Surgery Unit, Division of Surgery, Sultan Qaboos University Hospital, Muscat, Sultanate of Oman

INTRODUCTION

Acute limb ischemia (ALI) is a devastating complication of a sudden loss of blood flow to an extremity that can progress to irreversible ischemia if not promptly treated (1). This may manifest itself as limb-threatening complications including limb loss and limb length discrepancy (2). Common trauma and/or vascular events. Due to the rarity of this condition, and the lack of high-quality evidence, treatment strategies have largely been anecdotal or extrapolated from treatment of the adult patient. The authors propose a glimpse of their experience.

AIM

We share our experience and an algorithm that we follow (Figure 1) for management of PALI which requires a multi-disciplinary team approach.

METHODS

RESULTS

Iatrogenic arterial injury
The most common etiology for PALI is iatrogenic arterial injury during cannulation for diagnostic or therapeutic reasons (3). Principles of management include removal of the catheter, physical measures such as change of limb position and warming, use of antispasmodic and/or anti-coagulation.

Trauma
The second most common cause is traumatic injury (4). Penetrating injury is the most common underlying mechanism. Many patients have associated musculoskeletal trauma that necessitates surgical exploration and may lead to an increased rate of surgical repair of vascular injuries (5). Surgical reconstruction can be successfully performed in the subset of patients with minimal functional limb deficit.

Venous
Limb iatrogenic arterial injury, traumatic venous injury commonly occurs after venous cannulation resulting in venous thrombosis and potential venous ischemia. This entity is best managed with removal of the catheter and prompt initiation of anti-coagulation/antiplasmin therapy.

CONCLUSIONS
In this article, we described our experience in management of PALI and share a management algorithm that we follow, to standardize the evaluation and management of these cases. This approach the role of a MDT approach and individualized patient care in these critical situations. This is to improve overall functional outcomes and reduce mortality of acute limb ischemia in pediatric patients.
